How many times have you ordered a small item from Amazon, only to arrive in a box way bigger than necessary? The online shopping giant is well aware of the problem and its impact on the environment, and has taken steps to try to get suppliers to package their products in a way that creates less waste. To promote good practice, it's even been paying retailers $1 for each package they send out that's reusable, and it doesn't require an Amazon overbox, CNN reported recently. But from this week, that incentive turns into a fine, with some sellers facing a $2 penalty charge for each package that doesn't comply. The packaging conundrum is considered such a serious problem by Amazon that it created a Customer Packaging Experience team - currently comprising 85 people - in order to improve how Amazon and its sellers ship goods. Lead Kim Houchens says her team is constantly wondering, "What is the right design to ensure a product arrives unbroken, in the least wasteful package possible?" If you hadn't noticed, Amazon has become a gigantic, global operation since the company launched in 1994. This means that creating the most efficient packaging designs for its fulfillment centers, as well as getting its sellers around the world to properly package goods, will take some time. But its latest move to start handing out fines to some sellers for bad packaging reveals a serious change of gear as Amazon works to rectify things. The ecommerce company also has a Frustration-free Packaging program that works with sellers to help them improve the way they box their goods before they are shipped on their way to delivery. At its own fulfillment centers, the company introduced a packaging feedback button that allows workers to bring attention to a product that they believe may be able to ship without additional packaging. If they see such a package, the worker simply presses the button to send a message directly to the customer packaging experience team. The team then tests the product to confirm whether it has enough protection to transmit as it is. If the product gets the green light, a new Frustration-Free package can be added to the growing list of items. Commenting on the system last year, Amazon's Nikki Haven said the company's workers have a keen understanding of product packaging - they each pack thousands of products every day. Now that we have an easy way to make recommendations, we can work together to reduce packaging waste and improve the experiences of millions of customers.
